Community Medicine for Resident Nurses . Community Medicine for Resident Nurses Gynaecology. Community Medicine for Resident Nurses . Community Medicine for Resident Nurses Gynaecology. Community Medicine for Resident Nurses . Community Medicine for Resident Nurses Gynaecology. Community Medicine for Resident Nurses . Community Medicine for Resident Nurses Gynaecology. Introduction The field of community medicine has evolved from a therapeutic tradition to a public health approach during the last fifty years and today aims at defining the spectrum of health care for the whole community rather than the patients (Peterson & Swedo 2011). Community medicine is a subject with a unique history that can be traced back to the times of Hippocrates. Practice of community medicine has evolved over the centuries and has taken on different forms of integrating the knowledge and skills of different professions into one. It is an appropriate course for students of all medical specialties and can lead to more interesting careers in health care. Community medicine is currently designed as a four year integrated course (4–1–4–1), ideally completed within 4 years of postgraduate medical education. In 2010 the International Association of Community Health Services (IACHS) was formed through an agreement of several societies and associations that developed a set of recommended basic competencies to be acquired by community medicine practitioners. It is a recommended prerequisite for a Community Medicine (CM) Postgraduate Course (PG) as is a medical degree (MD) or a general practitioner degree (GP). The following community medicine topics will be addressed during the course: • Epidemiology • Public health preventive medicine • Maternal and child health, including HIV • Infectious diseases • Mental health • Refugee health • Chronic diseases • Primary care • Specialist and advanced practice • Evidence-based medicine • Health systems • Service provision • Community development • Professional ethics • Health promotion • Research • International health In addition, physicians should be familiar with the principles of law and medicine and be prepared to function as members of the legal team and to render legal testimony. All physicians, both in traditional and community-orientated medical specialties, play an important role in the community, and community medicine is thus an essential part of postgraduate medical education.
